

Use Your Environmental Health Skills in the NZ Army – Recruiting Now!

Force Health Protection Technicians help keep NZ Army personnel healthy, safe, and ready to operate. They identify and manage environmental and occupational health risks that can affect soldiers during training, exercises, deployments, and humanitarian operations. Their work helps prevent illness and non-battle injury, supports commanders' decision-making, and contributes directly to operational effectiveness.

Training includes NZ Army Basic Training followed by Preventive Medicine training with the Australian Defence Force, and ongoing professional development in New Zealand and overseas.

We are looking for people interested in:

- Environmental health
- Public health protection
- Risk management and compliance
- Science-based problem solving
- Working outdoors and in operational environments

This role may appeal to people with backgrounds or qualifications in environmental health, food safety, science, or compliance, although prior experience is not always required.

Interested in Learning More? Contact: specialists@defencecareers.mil.nz